

Are Europeans facing an identity crisis?

April 4, 2017

Author

Barbara Boettcher
+49(69)910-31787
barbara.boettcher@db.com

www.dbresearch.com

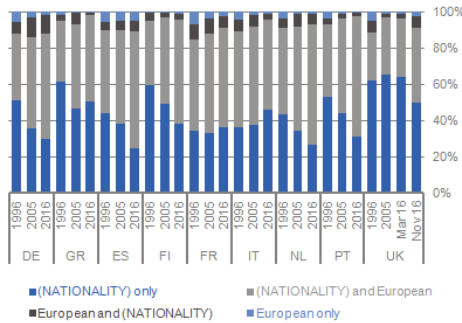

Deutsche Bank Research Management

Stefan Schneider

In the current debate about the future of the EU, politicians as well as the media are warning of a tendency by member states to shift their focus back to their own national interests and of a subsequent loss of significance of the EU. Are policymakers reacting to actual changes in the attitudes of EU citizens or is there an underlying perception issue here?

Mixed multiple identities

Feeling national and/or European: "In the near future, do you see yourself as..."

Sources: Eurobarometer, Deutsche Bank Research

According to the latest Eurobarometer polls from November 2016, most EU citizens increasingly feel they have both a national and a European identity. At the same time the share of those who define themselves pre-dominantly as citizens of their respective country has been constantly decreasing for the past 10 years. This trend is particularly distinct in the core countries of the EU such as Germany and the Netherlands.

While in 1996 half of the people interviewed in Germany identified themselves exclusively as German, this share has declined by almost 50% since then. In France, the proportion of people defining themselves solely as French was already lower than the respective figure for Germany in 1996 and has not changed considerably since then despite increasing troubles in the EU. Thus, the strength of European identity among Germans and French still forms the basis for intensified Franco-German initiatives in the EU. However, only a small number of citizens in the EU continue to feel exclusively European, which is not really surprising given the fact that the nation-state is the primary guarantor of civil rights.

An exception to this trend is Greece, where the majority of people do not feel European. The weak identification is not new; even before the crisis the Greeks already felt much more Greek than European. However, the public debt crisis and the resulting tensions between Brussels and Athens may well be the main reason behind the growing national sentiment of the Greeks since the advent of the crisis.

In Italy, too, the identification with Europe decreased in the course of the crisis. The EU and its alleged focus on fiscal austerity are also blamed for the country's economic problems. At the same time, eurosceptic populist force are gaining support – the eurosceptic Movimento 5 Stelle party currently holds around 30% of votes according to recent polls and would thus be the strongest political force in the event of early elections.

Are Europeans facing an identity crisis?

To the surprise of many observers, such a “crisis of identity” could not be detected in Spain and Portugal, the other two southern European member states that experienced significant problems during the euro area crisis. The trend towards a “blending” of national and European identity continued despite the crisis. The economic recovery in these two countries could be one reason for that. However, a more important factor is likely to be the positive role the EU played in the countries’ transition process to democracy. In any case, neither in Spain nor in Portugal could eurosceptical political forces gain significant ground.

The results of the survey are particularly interesting with regard to the UK and the Brexit referendum in June 2016. While British people traditionally have a strong sense of nationality – 60% of the British people consider themselves solely as British and not as European – this share dropped by 14 pts after the Brexit vote. The proportion of those who consider themselves just Europeans doubled.

Ultimately, when it comes to their sense of identity most people in Europe perceive themselves as both national and European citizens. Claims that the population of Europe is turning away from the project of European integration must therefore be seen as a wake-up call to reform and adjust the EU to the needs and expectations of the European public. This is also the starting point for the White Paper on the Future of Europe which the EU Commission has published on the occasion of the recent 60th anniversary of the Treaty of Rome. By presenting different scenarios for the future, the Commission aims to initiate the crucial debate on the direction the European project should take. At the EU summit in December the member states will discuss this matter further.

© Copyright 2017. Deutsche Bank AG, Deutsche Bank Research, 60262 Frankfurt am Main, Germany. All rights reserved. When quoting please cite “Deutsche Bank Research”.

The above information does not constitute the provision of investment, legal or tax advice. Any views expressed reflect the current views of the author, which do not necessarily correspond to the opinions of Deutsche Bank AG or its affiliates. Opinions expressed may change without notice. Opinions expressed may differ from views set out in other documents, including research, published by Deutsche Bank. The above information is provided for informational purposes only and without any obligation, whether contractual or otherwise. No warranty or representation is made as to the correctness, completeness and accuracy of the information given or the assessments made. In Germany this information is approved and/or communicated by Deutsche Bank AG Frankfurt, licensed to carry on banking business and to provide financial services under the supervision of the European Central Bank (ECB) and the German Federal Financial Supervisory Authority (BaFin). In the United Kingdom this information is approved and/or communicated by Deutsche Bank AG, London Branch, a member of the London Stock Exchange, authorized by UK’s Prudential Regulation Authority (PRA) and subject to limited regulation by the UK’s Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) (under number 150018) and by the PRA. This information is distributed in Hong Kong by Deutsche Bank AG, Hong Kong Branch, in Korea by Deutsche Securities Korea Co. and in Singapore by Deutsche Bank AG, Singapore Branch. In Japan this information is approved and/or distributed by Deutsche Securities Inc. In Australia, retail clients should obtain a copy of a Product Disclosure Statement (PDS) relating to any financial product referred to in this report and consider the PDS before making any decision about whether to acquire the product.